Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The architectural significance of the Izzo-Pelton House lies in its purity of Victorian detailing and form. Built in 1889, the exterior and interior remain essentially unaltered.

The three story detached house is basically rectangular in plan, with porches, towers and a porte cochere providing complexity and interest. The house is of frame construction with a native stone foundation.

The exterior represents a synthesis of Stick Style and Eastlake detailing. The varied roof forms, complex silhouettes and massing, projecting gables, sculptured chimneys, towers, etc. create an exuberant High Victorian expression against the sky. Much of the detailing, including the clapboard siding with additional overlaid boards running horizontally, vertically, diagonally and curvilinear exhibit distinctive Stick Style characteristics--the outward expression of the concealed structure. Contrasting the flat, Stick Style detail is the Eastlake detail, as shown by the porch columns and second floor balcony. The spindlework and balustrade details are an interpretation and reshaping of the furniture design principles of Charles Locke Eastlake. The exterior remains finely preserved, from the curved, beveled glass windows in the corner tower to the Moorish keyhole arch on the second floor balcony, and complex detailing and siding patterns.

Today, the only change to the exterior expression is the result of a sympathetic 1920's one story addition on the southwest corner of the house. Respect for the original design can be seen in the sensitivity of scale, a matching stone foundation, and wood siding.

The finely designed interior is also well preserved. Even today, the formal oak staircase in the foyer rising along a curved wall with beveled glass windows exudes the feeling of grandeur which surely has existed since Ora Pelton first lived here. Suspended over the staircase is a delicate crystal chandelier imported from Czechoslovakia. A stained glass skylight provides natural light in the third floor corridor. The interior woodwork, detailing, doors, door hardware, and hardwood flooring still remain in excellent condition. The parlor has retained its inlaid interlocking chain design parquet flooring defining each entrance into the room. Examples of the elegant fireplace and mantle designs can be seen in the parlor and in two of the second floor bedrooms. Rooms have not been altered, still retaining their original spatial interrelationships. Each room is finished with a different kind of wood: hall and stairway-oak; parlors-birch; dining room-sycamore; office-birds eye maple; kitchen-yellow leaf pine; second floor rooms-gum wood. The leaf of the type of wood used is depicted in a carving on the casing of each door frame for each room.

The carriage house in the rear, built in 1890, is also a significant structure. It remains essentially unaltered, helping to define the courtyard space behind the house. The design continuity of the house itself, the porte cochere, and the carriage house provide an integral sense of enclosure.

The site of the Izzo-Pelton house has retained its significance, and still commands a spectacular view of the Fox River and downtown Elgin.

Carriage House-1890

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Today, of the few remaining houses along the South State Street corridor the Izzo-Pelton house is the best preserved and represents the most significant example of Stick/Eastlake architectural style. Many of the other houses have been converted to other uses, substantially altered, or demolished. The fine condition of the Izzo-Pelton house can, in part, be attributed to its ownership by only two families--the Pelton's from 1889 to 1955 and the Izzo's from 1955 to the present. It was 1889 when Dr. Ora A. Pelton, Sr., a highly esteemed physician in both Elgin and Kane County, commissioned contractor and architect Gilbert M. Turnbull to design and construct a residence at 214 South State Street. Turnbull designed many significant structures in Elgin including the Elgin City Hall (1892, now demolished), Abby Wing School (1899), A. M. Steward Block (1888), Sherman Hospital (1893, substantially altered), German Evangelical Church (1893), as well as, a large number and variety of residences (single family, brick duplexes, and row housing). Many of Turnbull's designs were of a functional, utilitarian character. The Izzo-Pelton house appears to be one of the few existing examples of elaborate wood ornamentation designed by this local architect. The area chosen by Dr. Pelton for his residence was described by C. E. Botsford in 1891 as follows:

"Rising in a gradual ascent from the business portion, the residence area occupies a commanding position on the bluffs, which line the Fox River, and from which Elgin has received the sobriquet of "Bluff City". The wealthier residents vie with each other in the adornment of their homes, many of which are of beautiful architectural design, surrounded by large and well kept lawns. . . ."

The present house not only retains its architectural features but the surrounding vegetation and carriage house compose a setting representative of its original 1889 environment. Dr. Pelton continued to practice medicine in Elgin and by 1935 he held the record of being the longest practicing physician in this portion of the state, as well as being recognized as a prominent surgeon.
