SALINE COUNTY POOR FARM

Narrative Description

The Saline County Poor Farm is located on the south end of Harrisburg, Illinois at 1600 Feazel Street. The site originally contained 175 acres, but was sold off until the present 3.46 acres is all that remains of the historic property. This acreage now contains the main brick poor farm house, a storage building and the poor farm cemetery. The Poor House is of a modified Italianate design and was constructed in 1877. The Poor House along with the Storage Building sit on 2.06 acres. The cemetery that is located diagonally across Feazel Street sits on roughly 1.40 acres. The cemetery has over time been called McCormick Cemetery, Pauper Cemetery and Dorrisville Cemetery. The Saline County Poor Farm is a discontinuous district because the cemetery is geographically separated from the poor farm buildings, but both retain their historic significance and integrity.

Exterior of the Poor House

The historic main façade of the Poor House faces north toward what is today Barnett Street. The area historically associated with the Poor Farm between the house and South Street is now occupied by a housing development. The parking area for the Poor Farm is now located off Feazel Street making the west façade the most visible façade. The Poor House is a 2 ½ story brick building with a stone foundation and hipped roof with asphalt shingles. A well-matched addition was constructed to the west of the original building in circa 1904 doubling the size of the building. A center chimney is visible along the roofline. Both the north façade and the south façade have large porches running almost the length of the building. All windows are wooden 2/2 double hung, except the basement windows and one window on the second story, west façade. All windows have segmental arched lintels and stone sills.

The north façade has ten openings. There are three equally spaced windows on the first floor with a door on either side of the center window. Both doors are wood and have a transom. The second story has five windows directly above each of the first floor openings. One of the windows on the second floor was converted into a door, probably for use as a fire escape. This side of the house has a one story porch with Doric columns, simple railings, wooden stairs and is covered at the base with lattice.

SALINE COUNTY POOR FARM

The east façade of the Poor House has six openings in a solid brick wall—two on the first story, two on the second story and a window and coal shoot door at the basement level. The basement window is a fixed pane with six lights. The openings are located directly above or below one another.

The south façade has thirteen openings. Due to the slope of the property, the bottom floor has been excavated so that it is about three feet below ground level with entrances directly into the basement from outside. The basement level has two doors and three windows. The first floor is reached by walking up a set of stairs to the raised porch. The porch on this side of the house has a similar railing to the porch on the opposite side of the house, but the columns are more decorative turned posts rather than Doric columns. The first floor has two windows on either end that are outside the porch and two doors with a window between them under the porch. The doors are both wood and have transoms. The second story has four equally spaced windows.

The west façade of the Poor House, which is now the most visible entrance from the street, has eight windows. The first floor has two windows closer to either end of the building with no middle window. The second floor has three equally spaced windows. The middle window is 1/1 double hung rather than 2/2. The basement level has three window openings. Two on either end have segmented arches and six lights. The center window has a flat lintel with a multi divided light window. Two chimneys are visible along this side of the building.

Interior of the Poor House

Inside the Poor House, the rooms are arranged by function. The interior spaces are very simple in detail with plain wood trim and wainscoting in certain rooms. The first floor was designated for the superintendent and his family and has six rooms. The west end of the building is a large open room referred to today as the meeting room. This space was originally divided by a wall. The east side is composed of smaller rooms. A staircase leads from the meeting room on the first floor to the hallway on the second floor. The second floor was a sleeping area for the poor and has eight small rooms and a stair hall. Many rooms on this floor can only be reached by going through other rooms. The same staircase that leads upstairs also leads down from the first floor to the basement. In the basement is a kitchen, utility/furnace room and a few other rooms now used for displays and storage. The basement was used to feed the occupants, although one room was also a stable later converted to a work room. The basement has six rooms.

Storage Building

The Storage Building across from the south entrance of the Poor House is thought to be a laundry house/meat and miscellaneous storage facility. Its date cannot be determined, but it is thought to be constructed at the same time the 1904 addition was added to the 1877 brick Poor House. The Storage House is a gable roof, one and a half story, frame structure with a small overhanging porch on the north side. It is covered with wood vertical board and batten siding that is painted red. The north side of this building faces the south side of the Poor House. A concrete patio or walkway links the two buildings. The building is entered on the north side by either of two doors that lead into what is not the curio shop. The east and west ends of the building have one double hung window and the south side has no openings.

Poor Farm Cemetery

The Poor Farm Cemetery consists of roughly 1.4 acres on a rectangular shaped lot located in the southwest corner of Barnett and Feazel Streets. The cemetery has approximately twenty-one stones still stand, mostly scattered, and there are indications of numerous graves without markers. Most of the markers are limestone, but a few sandstone and concrete markers exist. Some markers are simple rectangles with no names or dates. Other markers have names with no dates and some have names and dates that were written free form in wet concrete. A list from 1980 of markers and information about the Dorrisville Cemetery (also the Poor Farm Cemetery) is attached as Appendix A. This list clearly indicates more than twenty-one stones. This would seem to indicate that even more have disappeared since 1980.

Changes of the Saline County Poor Farm

Changes have occurred over time to the Saline County Poor Farm buildings and property. In 1904, an addition was added to the 1877 building. Some changes made since 1904 include the following: a door was sealed on the first floor and a wall was removed to increase space, a boiler was added in 1948 with a vented chimney up the middle of the buildings and two chimneys were roofed over on the east side. Most of the outbuildings associated with the farm are gone and much of the surrounding property sold off geographically separating the cemetery from the remaining buildings.

In 1961, several buildings were moved onto the site including an old jail, a Quaker Church, a one room school, a log caretaker's cabin, a long general store, a log two story house, a log saddle bad cabin, a blacksmiths shop and a log barn with a thrashing floor. The log cabins date to circa 1840-1850. The person responsible for moving the buildings onto the site was John Allen, author of the book, Legends and Lore of Southern Illinois. At the time Allen moved the buildings to the Saline County Poor Farm site, he was curator of the Southern Illinois Museum, as well as the Saline County Museum.

The buildings moved to the site and placed around the existing Poor Farm House and Storage Building do not contribute to the significance of the Saline County Poor Farm. They also do not detract from the historic integrity of this property. Originally the 175-acre poor farm contained several outbuildings including "pest houses." The "pest houses" were buildings that housed people who had contagious diseases. The "pest houses" and the original cabins that first made up the poor farm are a reminder that there were a mix of buildings on the site. The Poor Farm House and Storage Building, along with the Poor Farm Cemetery, convey the historic significance of the Saline County Poor Farm and retain their integrity

Statement of Significance

The Saline County Poor Farm is locally significant for listing in the National Register of Historic Places under Criterion A for its association with county government efforts to promote the welfare of the local poor from 1877 when the existing Poor House was built to 1950, the fifty year cutoff for significance to the National Register. County Poor Farms were the predominate method of dealing with the poor, elderly and handicapped. The Saline County Poor Farm represents a method of dealing with social problems during a time when there was very little money for social welfare.

Southern Illinois was permanently settled first on the Mississippi River by French speaking people starting in 1699, and on the Ohio River by English speaking people starting about 1775. The Saline Springs, named for salt yielding springs along the Saline River, were a major attraction to the new United States Government because salt was necessary for food and tanning hides, and a source of tax revenue noticed by President Thomas Jefferson. Settlements along the rivers included Shawneetown on the Ohio and Kaskaskia, Cahokia, and Fort de Chartres, provided points of departure for pioneers looking for land along the Kaskaskia and Goshen Trail. Illinois became a state in 1818. Inland settlements soon sprang up and when the transmigrated culture become more organized, Counties were Saline County was created from Gallatin County in 1847 and was the 99th out of the 102 countries founded in Illinois¹

As early as 1819, the Illinois General Assembly enacted legislation concerning care for the poor. Prior to this time the common method of preventing starvation, deprivation, and exposure to the elements was to “let them out” to individuals who would provide necessary care.²

This procedure was formalized by the Pauper Bill of March 5, 1819, which commanded County Commissioners Courts to appoint two overseers of the poor for each township within the county. To be placed on the “poor book” of the township, it was necessary that the overseers establish, first, the need for care, and second, that the person had been a resident of the county for at least a year. When these two factors had been established, their names were then placed on the “poor book” by order of two justices of the peace.³

Each year the paupers were “sold” to the lowest bidder. Notice of “letting” of paupers was published in public places ten days prior to the bidding, and the sale was conducted on the steps of the courthouse, and the low bidders took charge of the welfare of the pauper for the following year.⁴ Guardians of the poor were guaranteed the pauper’s labor in return for food and shelter, plus a stipend from the county for taking care of the individual. Any guardian who mistreated his charge usually had one half his stipend withheld by the court.⁵ Care of the mentally ill, elderly, or handicapped by family members (at the expense of the county) was generally accepted. It was not unusual for family members to support each other in this manner.

By 1839, most of the poor were under the care of individuals, with the county reimbursing the guardian in proportion to the paupers ability as a laborer. In the case of the elderly, ill and handicapped persons the court set the reimbursement rate according to the amount of care needed to sustain those persons.⁶

As stated in the Green County Almshouse National Register Application:

The almshouse system of public welfare was introduced to Illinois in 1839 through state legislation. The almshouse was a locally administered facility, and the decision to develop this type of relief system was left to the county. In 1840, Morgan County became the first to adopt the almshouse system. By 1880, all but eight counties had established an almshouse (Boone, Clark, Crawford, Edwards, Ford, Gallatin, Jasper and Pope). By 1903 only two counties had not developed the almshouse system of indoor relief (Boone and Pope).⁷

Counties which elected to develop an almshouse-based relief system allocated the necessary funds and either constructed a building to be used specifically as an almshouse or purchased an existing building and converted it to an almshouse. Most counties located their almshouse (or poor house) in a rural setting and purchased land to be farmed by pauper labor. Thus, the poor house became regionally known as the poor farm, or county farm.⁸

When Saline County was formed from Gallatin County in February 1846, overseers of the poor were appointed as directed under the bill of 1819. Sixteen years later, in 1863, the Saline County Commissioners in keeping with the 1839 legislation, proposed that a farm be purchased so that the large number of poor on the rolls would be housed comfortably and with only one overseer. A special tax was levied on all taxable property in Saline County for the year 1863, the amount being one-fourth of one percent on each hundred dollars of valuation of taxable property.⁹ In Saline County the method of dealing with indigenous paupers who were no longer able to take care of themselves, included first in "farming" them out and then through the use of log "poor houses" and finally in the construction of the Saline County Poor House in 1877.

On the 20th of May 1863, Saline County purchased one hundred and seventy acres of land from Kinchen and Gaithy Odum for the sum of fourteen hundred two dollars and fifty cents. This land was the proposed site for the new county farm.¹⁰ Log buildings were constructed and an overseer appointed to superintend the facility. As reported in the Greene County Almshouse application to the National Register of Historic Places:

In 1870, the Illinois State Board of Public Charities was organized to monitor all forms of indoor relief. Although county almshouses were locally administered, they were subjected to an annual review. The condition of the "special classes" was an immediate concern of the State Board of Public Charities. As early as 1870, the Board suggested the insane be transferred from the county farms to state institutions.¹¹

A report issued by the Board of State Commissioners of Public Charities of the State of Illinois and dated December 1870, describes the Saline County Poor farm (or almshouse) as follows:

The Saline County Almshouse is a cheap log building, but may be made quite comfortable. The inmates appear to be well cared for. The keeper receives the use of the farm and $100 for each pauper per annum.¹²

SALINE COUNTY POOR FARM

In June 1872, the records indicate that smallpox was rampant in the county. It was during this time that local historians believe that a "pest house" was built on the northeast corner of the yard, although there are no records to verify it. The pest house was a four room, square building where sick individuals were sent to either recover or die. During the smallpox epidemic those people who had already had the disease were pressed into service to nurse the sick at the farm. According to the son of the last overseer of the poor house, the pest house building was moved to another location in Harrisburg.¹³

By the latter part of 1876, it became necessary for the county to provide a new building on the site of the poor farm. The log buildings were rotting away, so it was decided that a new house for the county poor would be built. This time it would be made of brick. On January 31, 1877, the County paid A. Winterberger $1,250 as a first installment on the construction of the new building. In May the final payment was made of $1,000, then $50 for another cistern, $5 for a table for the paupers, and $10 for "extras" on the house.¹⁴

Records of the Board of Public Charities from 1900 to 1906 indicated that conditions at the Saline County Poor Farm were far from ideal. The buildings were not in good condition and the farm was not run in the best manner.¹⁵ In 1910, the State Board of Administration and Charities Commission (the successor organization to the State Board of Public Charities) in a report about the poor farm in Saline County stated:

Men and women are not separated in any way. One feeble minded woman became pregnant over a year ago through intercourse with an inmate who had a bad case of asthma. They went away and were married. In less than four months they were both back. A child was born. It is now one year old and the woman is again pregnant. Another woman is at the farm with an illegitimate child of one year. At the time of inspection, one girl of twenty-five, who had a bad case of consumption, occupied a room with her mother and father. The father is crippled on account of work in the mines. The bed bugs are plentiful. The keeper says all inmates get mad and refuse to work part of the time.¹⁶

In 1917, counties were authorized to establish poor houses jointly with other counties. However, the Saline County Poor Farm continued to serve only Saline County. Legislation in 1919 required county poor farms to change their names to county homes; the county home law was renewed in 1935 and again in 1945. The Public Assistance Code was passed in 1948 and made relief of the indigent a function of newly established county departments of welfare. Under this code, counties were forbidden from placing destitute, but physically healthy individuals in county homes and were authorized to care only for the infirm or chronically ill.¹⁷

Records of the Saline County Board of Supervisors indicate that the Poor Farm Committee reported on an occasional basis to the county supervisors during the years of operation of the poor farm. . In July 1950, a report was made about the play ground investigations at the poor farm; this appears to be the last report of the committee regarding the poor farm. The Saline County Poor Farm remained open into the 1950s.¹⁸

David J. Rothman in his book entitled, The Discovery of the Asylum: Social Order and Disorder in the New Republic states:

The spread of almshouses through the villages, towns, and cities of antebellum America at once established a uniformity of practice and a diversity of conditions. Institutionalization became the standard public response to the problem of poverty, but officials enacted the program with a wide variety of skill, sympathy, and diligence. A benevolent overseers of the poor was sometimes able to comfort a small group of dependents by carefully maintaining a handful of rooms and setting a decent table. But where administration rather casual oversight was necessary, where more was required than a good heart, the results were generally unsatisfactory. One finds in these circumstances the clearest evidence of the gap between the ideal and the reality of the almshouse..... Through the 1870's and 1880's and well into the 1890's, most forums proclaimed the superiority of indoor relief over outdoor relief. Practically every participant in the national conference on charity and correction, as well as economists and social critics, voiced their approval. It was not until the progressive era that the consensus reached in the Jacksonian period on the proper treatment of the poor began to splinter.¹⁹

The Saline County Poor Farm is a reflection of America's social policy regarding the poor in the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century. Its importance to the local community and Saline County should be recognized and the remaining buildings and cemetery preserved.
